On July 6, 2005, Londoners exulted in the news that the International Olympic Committee had chosen London as the site of the 2012 Olympic games. The next day, July 7, terrorists detonated bombs in the London Underground and on a double-decker bus, killing 56 people, including themselves, and injuring hundreds more. A second attempted attack two weeks later was completely unsuccessful. As of press time, British police had arrested four men thought to be the would-be murderers. It's with a heavy heart that I report this news because the last thing I want to do is discourage anyone from traveling to London. In the weeks following the attacks, London was, understandably, on edge. Police presence in the subways was dramatically increased, and packages and backpacks were searched. What's important to emphasize, however, is the way Londoners reacted. Jitters aside, they refused to be terrorized. A palpable sense of solidarity and determination was felt throughout the city. London's emergency hospital, police, and transportation services were able to respond quickly
