But fate had other plans for Sabina, as she found herself thrust into the midst of a tempest that would forever change the course of her life.

The storm, one of the fiercest in recent memory, unleashed its fury upon the village with a ferocity that seemed almost supernatural. The winds howled, tearing through the air with an ear-piercing intensity, while the rain poured relentlessly, drenching everything in its path. The village was engulfed in chaos, with houses collapsing and trees uprooted. Panic and fear gripped the hearts of the villagers, as they desperately sought shelter from the wrath of nature.

This is the memoir of Bella Kuligowska Zucker, the only person in her family to survive the Holocaust. In September 1939, Bella was a carefree teenager living in Poland when the German army struck. She was rounded up with her friends and family and sent to a series of grim Jewish ghettos. After loved ones were separated and lost through the war years, Bella survived by changing her identity. Narrowly escaping death each time, she moved from place to place, odd job to odd job, new name to new name. After finding the birth certificate of a Catholic girl five years her senior, she became Sabina Mazurek. Then she went into the eye of the storm, Germany, where she believed she might be safest. "Sabina is her story. As in "Diary of a Young Girl" by Anne Frank and "Night" by Elie Wiesel, Bella Kuligowska marshaled unexpected resources to manage as a teen during the horrors of World War II. Sabina offers a different perspective on how many Jews survived outside of the concentration camps, in more familiar yet infinitely hostile settings, with the help of others along the way.
