The Five Stages

The title of the novel serves as a clear reference to Kübler-Ross model, commonly known as the five stages of grief. Andrew Brawley's journey through this framework forms the foundation of the storyline, allowing readers to intimately witness each stage:

1. Denial

Andrew is a patient living in the Burn Unit of a hospital, having lost his family in a tragic accident. As he navigates his grief and guilt, denial becomes a coping mechanism, shielding him from facing the harsh reality of his loss.

2. Anger

Burning with anger and resentment, Andrew channels his emotions into superhero comics, where he finds solace among characters who fight injustice. This stage portrays the intensity of his emotions, reflecting both the anger he feels towards the world and the anger he directs at himself.

3. Bargaining

In this stage, Andrew yearns for redemption and attempts to find meaning in his life by forming connections with other patients in the hospital. He seeks to create significant bonds and protect those who feel like they have nothing left to lose.

4. Depression

As Andrew confronts the reality of his situation, depression sets in. This stage delves into the depths of despair and desolation that someone experiences when they cannot see a way forward. It is a raw portrayal of the loneliness and despondency that can consume a person.

5. Acceptance

The final stage of the journey represents the start of healing. Andrew must accept the circumstances of his life and forge a path forward, allowing himself to begin the process of recovery and finding hope amidst the darkness.
