Unveiling the Origins

The Race That Stopped The World traces its origins back to the early 19th century, when horseracing was gaining momentum as a popular sport among the British elite. In 1861, a visionary race organizer by the name of James Buxton decided to create an event that would bring together the best horses, jockeys, and enthusiasts from around the world under one roof. Little did he know that his brainchild would evolve into a global phenomenon that transcends borders and unites people.

The inaugural edition of The Race That Stopped The World was held at a rustic countryside racetrack, which has since become an iconic venue in the annals of racing history. The race was an instant hit, captivating the audience with its unparalleled excitement and adrenaline-fueled atmosphere. Over the years, the event grew in both popularity and prestige, attracting a diverse range of participants and spectators.

In 1934, Melbourne's Lord Mayor announced a London-to-Melbourne air race to celebrate his city's centenary.

The audacious plan captured imaginations across the globe: newspapers and magazines everywhere were filled with it; the world's pilots scrambled to get sponsorship; and the organisers scrambled to get the rules straight and permission to fly in foreign air space. Sixty-four entrants from eleven countries signed up, but only twenty planes eventually took off on 20 October 1934. The winner arrived in Melbourne seventy-one hours later—but three planes crashed and two pilots died in the attempt.

The world followed the progress and applauded the winners, Britain's Grovsnor House (outright) and The Netherlands' Uiver (on handicap), but the real climax of the story is the astonishing efforts by the town of Albury in saving the Uiver as it battled through a fierce thunderstorm with no navigational aids, guiding the tiny plane to an emergency landing in the middle of the town with the most quick-thinking, imaginative response to its terrifying predicament.

This heroic race, considered the greatest single sporting event in the history of aviation, is a tale of eccentric characters, daring deeds and sublime courage. Di
