It was the most amazing event in the history of mankind. Out of nowhere, deep in the blackness of space, a familiar sight slowly began to appear in the heavens above Earth!

At first, nobody knew quite what it was. It's shape, at first unclear, incomplete, as it phased itself into our existence form wherever its own had been. But eventually, after weeks of transformation, its full shape now clear in the new sky. There, just one and a half million miles away, was the unmistakable mirror image of our own Earth.

Yet, for all its perfect similarities, there was something different about this new Earth, this Other Earth, as it came to be called. There were some things, some tiny details, that weren't quite the same.

As every telescope and piece of technology that could survey the new planet focused its attention on the greatest wonder the human eye had ever seen, it was clear that it wasn't entirely a perfect replica of our own Earth.
