The folks I dealt with always seemed to listen attentively, but that meant little when many of them worked for me. Things changed when I started carrying a gun and driving a modified off-roader. Then people really listened, laughed at my jokes and put their lives in my hands, all while paying for the privilege.

In that regard switching from British CEO to African safari guide was a known quantity – swapping the comfort of big-fish-small-pond for the challenges of entertaining, educating and keeping safe. In every other way, the change was a leap into the unknown, and the little my wife and I knew of South Africa turned out to be wrong. Snakes weren't out to get me or anyone else, apartheid wasn't nearly as black and white as you'd think, and evil spirits were at least real enough to get you time off work.

We had the snot scared out of us by over-affectionate rhino, armed poachers, and an elephant that preferred his cars upside-down. One guest accused us of stealing the moon; another wanted overly personal services. Our Zulu colleagues came from a different world – where polygamy is the norm and elephant dung protects against lightning – but a shared love of the bush meant we grew to understand each other.

More than anything else, we learned. A lot. About nature, about Africa, and of course about ourselves. Not so much the clichéd growing-as-a-person way; more new perspectives on human mannerisms given the animal behaviour we studied.

"Everyone has a book in them and that, in most cases, is where it should stay", according to Christopher Hitchens. I generally agree, but the whole experience was simply too different, too eye-poppingly extraordinary to remain contained within me, and this is the result – my account of our first year in Africa.
